What can be done here to compel silence and patience? Conflicts arise, consequently, between rival powers whose frontiers are not clearly defined; command shifts about, and obedience is diminished. The multitude, abandoned to the revolutionists and to itself, continues to perform the same bloody antics, while the municipal chiefs whom it has elected, Bailly, Mayor of Paris, and Lafayette, commandant of the national guard, are obliged to use cunning, to implore, to throw themselves between the multitude and the unfortunates whom they wish to destroy. Neither public measures nor private charity could meet the overwhelming need.
