CityLab spoke with Dickey about the book and the unspeakable things America keeps half-buried. The wind lashed the panes of glass; shots volleyed in the Park and a tree fell. They have taken with them across the border their clothes, their manners, their breeding, their band-boxes, and valets and ladies' maids.

When I saw the low score it has on Netflix I almost didn't put it on and that would be a shame. Finally I get to read their story. The magnificent main house at Rosewell burned in but it is hardly a distant memory. From the outside, The William Ramsay House was beautiful and inspired others in the lower King Street community to improve their buildings.

I was freaked out, but convinced myself that it was just a pissed off raccoon. I walked over to the wall I stood where the light would have created my shadow and there was. Coming close to the house, you get the sensation of pain and anger.
